Chapter 1 by Darkforest

She always loved the forest. She often spent hours climbing trees, playing in the moss, spotting animals, and drinking from the creek. She knew she might get sick if she drank from the creek, but she never did. She always went back day after day to that creek.

It was enchanting.

The smell of the forest was clean like fresh cut grass and gushing waterfalls. The sight of it was spectacular. The lush green trees and babbling brooks always had her coming back for more. The music of the birds sang wondrous melodies in her ears as she played in the creek.

But one day was different from the rest. She did her usual routine, got off the bus, went home, changed into some different clothes, and went out to the forest to play in the creek. But this time the creek looked different. It glowed a sparkling blue and the plants inside were glowing like neon paint.

She stuck her hand into the water and it disappeared right before her very eyes. She pulled it back out and it was still there. She put her hand in the creek and out of the creek multiple times. She giggled at her discovery and decided to go to the deepest part of the creek where she could
